Chapter 1

The Bookshop Bouquet

Rain tapped¹ against the windows of Bookmark as I arranged² the new fiction display³. April showers had been constant this week, keeping the village indoors and my shop quieter than usual. The brass⁴ bell⁵ above the door jingled⁶, bringing in a gust⁷ of damp⁸ air and Emma Lancaster, arms full of flowers.

"Morning, Alice!" she called, dripping⁹ onto the welcome mat¹⁰. "Special delivery. First peonies of the season, and I thought of you immediately¹¹."

My heart lifted¹² at the sight of the plump¹³ pink blooms¹⁴ nestled¹⁵ among ferns¹⁶ and white sprigs¹⁷ of breath. "Emma, they're beautiful! How much do I owe¹⁸ you?"

She waved away¹⁹ my question. "Consider²⁰ it a gift to brighten²¹ this dreary²² day. Besides, they opened a bit early and won't last²³ for selling."

I found my grandmother's old blue vase in the back room and filled it with water. As I unwrapped²⁴ the bouquet, the sweet, subtle fragrance²⁵ transported me instantly²⁶ to my childhood²⁷—to Grandma's garden where peonies lined²⁸ the brick²⁹ pathway³⁰, their heavy heads nodding³¹ in June breezes.

"Perfect spot³²," Emma approved³³ as I placed them on the counter near the register³⁴. "They need to be seen."

Throughout³⁵ the morning, the peonies worked a kind of magic on my customers³⁶. Mrs. Wilson, who normally³⁷ hurried³⁸ through her mystery novel selections³⁹ with barely⁴⁰ a word, paused⁴¹ to admire⁴² them.

"My mother grew these," she said softly, touching⁴³ a petal⁴⁴ with careful⁴⁵ fingers. "The same shade of pink." For a moment, her eyes glistened⁴⁶ with unexpected⁴⁷ tears before she collected⁴⁸ herself and continued her shopping.

Later, ten-year-old Sophie from the village school came in with her mother. While her mother browsed⁴⁹ the cookbooks, Sophie stood transfixed⁵⁰ before the flowers.

"They look like ballet dancers," she whispered⁵¹, then asked if she could draw them. She sat cross-legged⁵² on the floor with paper and colored pencils, her face serious with concentration.

By afternoon, a young couple⁵³ I hadn't seen before wandered⁵⁴ in, shaking off⁵⁵ umbrellas.

"Peonies!" the woman exclaimed⁵⁶. "Mark, look — just like the ones at that garden where you proposed⁵⁷." They shared a private smile, fingers intertwining⁵⁸ as they told me they were visiting Ferndale for their anniversary⁵⁹.

As closing time⁶⁰ approached⁶¹, the rain finally stopped.

Sunshine⁶² broke through⁶³, sending golden light across⁶⁴ the wooden floorboards⁶⁵. Some of the peony petals had begun to fall, creating a soft pink carpet on the counter. I was gathering⁶⁶ them when the bell rang⁶⁷ once more.

James Mitchell, the village veterinarian, stepped⁶⁸ inside. His dark hair was slightly⁶⁹ damp, and he carried⁷⁰ a folder⁷¹ under one arm.

"Just made it," he said with a smile. "Has my book arrived?"

"It has." I reached⁷² beneath⁷³ the counter for the bird identification guide he'd ordered⁷⁴. "Came yesterday."

James noticed⁷⁵ the flowers and his expression⁷⁶ softened⁷⁷. "Peonies already? That's early this year."

"Emma brought them this morning. They've been quite the conversation piece."

He approached the counter, touching one of the fallen petals. "My mother grew these in our garden in Devon. Not many flowers have such presence, do they?"

"They've been reminding⁷⁸ everyone of someone today," I said. "They seem to carry memories."

Together we gathered the scattered⁷⁹ petals. Our fingers brushed⁸⁰ once, twice, and I felt a surprising⁸¹ flutter⁸² in my chest⁸³. James collected⁸⁴ a small handful⁸⁵ and looked at them thoughtfully⁸⁶.

"Too beautiful to throw away⁸⁷," he said.

I found a small paper envelope⁸⁸ and held it open. "Take them home if you like."

unexpected warmth⁹⁰. "Thank you. I think I'll press them in a book."

"A man after my own heart," I said, then felt my cheeks warm slightly. "My grandmother taught me to press flowers between heavy books. I still do it sometimes."

James paid for his guide, tucking⁹¹ the envelope of petals inside. "Perhaps you could show me your technique sometime? I'd like to preserve⁹² these properly⁹³."

"I'd be happy to," I replied, surprised by how much I meant it.

After he left, I selected one perfect petal from those remaining and placed it inside my current novel as a bookmark⁹⁴. The rain had started again, a soft patter against the windows, but the shop felt warmer somehow.

That single bouquet had created a day of stories and connections I hadn't expected when Emma first arrived. I locked⁹⁵ the shop door and turned⁹⁶ the sign to 'Closed,' wondering⁹⁷ what memories the peonies had stirred⁹⁸ for James, and why the thought made me smile all the way home through the rain.
