

Contents

Abbreviations — VIII

Introduction — 1

An Evening in Brussels — 1

Government Office Buildings: A Recently “Discovered” Category of “Political Architecture” — 4

Demarcations, Ambitions and Sources — 12

Structure — 18

Part 1

The Advent of the Administrative Expert: Managerial Discourses, Civil Service Reform Plans and Office Design Around the First World War — 20

A Critical Wartime Report: Louis Wodon’s 1915 “Productivist” Analysis — 20

The Administrative Internationale and the Appeal of Scientific Management — 25

Efficiency Across the Atlantic — 28

Henri Fayol, the Creator of an “Administrative Doctrine” — 34

The Reception of Fayol’s Theories by the French and Belgian Governments — 39

International Trends in Office Building Architecture — 44

Institutionalised Inequalities in the Open-Plan Office — 44

Analogous Spaces: Offices and Factories — 49

The Problem of Government Expansion — 56

“The Engine and Brain of the State”: Max-Léo Gérard’s 1922 Essay on Efficiency — 56

“Who Cares About Administrative Problems?” Construction Policies in the 1920s — 64

Part 2

The Era of the Plan: Political Innovation and Civil Service Reform in the Mid-1930s — 70

A Longing for Order: The Rise of the Planning Concept — 70

Political Innovation in Mid-1930s Belgium: “Planist” and “Zeelandist” Quests for Efficient Government — 79

“Father of the Plan, We Will Follow You!” The “Planist” Recovery Proposals by Hendrik de Man — 79

A “New Deal” by Paul van Zeeland — 85

Louis Camu, a “Young Intellectual” with an “Iron Will” — 92

Camu and Molitor: Complementary Forms of Expertise — 96

A Stimulating Working Environment: The Shell Building — 101

In Search of Architectural Expertise — 107

Verwilghen and Eggericx: “Moderate Modernists” —	112
The April 1937 Report on the Office Buildings by Eggericx and Verwilghen —	116
Zeitgeist and Monumentality —	116
“As Efficient as a Factory” —	121
The Influence of German Models: Ernst Neufert’s Bauentwurfslehre —	128
The Influence of German models: Hans Poelzig’s I.G.-Farben-Haus —	136
In Search of a Location —	140
Camu’s 1937 Writings on Administration and Architecture —	147
A Moral Reform through the Introduction of a “Statute” —	147
A Condemnation of Slums and Flaneurs —	152
An Endorsement of Banalisation and Transparency —	158
A Modernist Manifesto —	164
“Kraft durch Freude”: The Reception of the Report on the Office Buildings —	171

Part 3

The Lure of Political Authoritarianism: Administrative Reform as a Prelude to the New Order — 176

Camu’s Quest for Bureaucratic Autonomy —	176
From the Prime Minister’s Chef de cabinet to Royal Commissioner with Extended Powers —	176
A Network-Embedded Royal Commissariat —	182
Continuing Political Instability under the Spaak Government —	188
“A Work of Organisation and Rationalisation”: The Royal Commissariat’s Final Report on the Office Buildings (January 1940) —	193
A Radicalising Royal Commissioner —	193
The “Ideal” Layout of a Ministerial Office Building, or the Temptation of Hubert Lyautey’s Model of Colonial Efficiency —	197
Between Stability and Innovation: the Representative Qualities of the New Ministerial Offices in the Urban Landscape —	204
Hierarchised Surveillance and Distinction —	213
An Ambiguous Transparency —	227
Political-Administrative Reform in Occupied Belgium (1940–1944)? —	230
The Quest for a Role in a New Order —	230
Transparent Architecture for an “Unmitigated Monarchy” —	233
Order, Method and Punctuality —	240

Conclusion — 247

    A Technocratic Moment in Belgium — 247

    Homo Novus: The Administrative Expert as a New Figure of Power — 250

    A Centralised Office Complex as an Antidote Against a Fragmented Government — 254

Bibliography — 258

Image Sources — 287

About this Book — 288

Index — 289