

Contents

Introduction	7
The confrontation of different concepts of action research	13
Lewin's understanding of action research	13
A new paradigm for the social sciences	18
The relationship between theory and practice in scientific research	18
Science and everyday life practice	21
Moser's attempt to create a new paradigm for the social sciences	23
Kuhn's theory of the paradigm shift	23
Discourse as a fundamental category of the concept of action research	29
Sketched discourse	34
Conclusion	41
Other attempts to justify action research as social action	45
Emphasising socio-political objectives in the development of an action research strategy	45
Confronting action research with two fundamental scientific theoretical positions (critical rationalism and critical theory)	49
Three general principles of action research	55
Conclusion	59
Action research as an attempt to politicise science	61
The political moment in science	61
Relevance of findings in action research practice	65
Conclusion	70

Klafki's attempt to combine the methodological principles of quantitative empirical science and the concept of action research73

Action research as a process of changing practice81

 Participatory action research and links to practice84

 The challenge of social change89

 Action research as an innovative and creative approach to practice94

 Conclusion102

Summary.....103

References109

Index113