

Contents

List of Abbreviations — XI

1	Introduction: The trouble with subjects — 1
1.1	Aspects of subjecthood across Germanic languages — 1
1.2	Cross-Germanic comparison and the interest of 16 th century data — 3
1.3	Outline of the study — 5
2	Comparative concepts of subjecthood for Germanic languages — 11
2.1	Informational and argumental subjecthood: towards a definition — 11
2.1.1	Argumental subjecthood — 11
2.1.2	Informational subjecthood — 18
2.1.3	Working definitions — 20
2.1.4	Language-specific constructional variation — 22
2.2	Constructional variation across Germanic — 24
2.2.1	The placement of subjects across Germanic — 24
2.2.2	Formal subjects and dissociation — 36
2.2.3	Non-nominative subjects — 50
2.3	The spectrum of subjecthood criteria across Germanic — 65
3	The pragmatics of clause syntax in Early Modern Germanic — 69
3.1	Introduction — 69
3.2	Degrees of Ausbau in Early Modern Germanic — 71
3.2.1	Extensive and intensive Ausbau — 71
3.2.2	Sociolinguistic factors — 72
3.2.3	Written genres in Germanic in the 1580s–1590s — 74
3.2.4	“Periodic style” as a core grammatical concept in and for early modern written languages — 77
3.3	Formal characteristics of the corpus — 81
3.3.1	Editorial characteristics of the four chapbooks — 81
3.3.2	Cross-examination of chapter 45 — 82
3.3.3	The syntax of descriptions — 106
3.4	Conclusion: The discourse syntax of Early Modern Germanic subjects — 116

4	Informational subjecthood between discourse structure and sentence structure: Ellipsis, anaphora and topicalization — 119
4.1	Introduction: Issues in the syntacticization of topics — 119
4.2	Subject ellipsis — 120
4.2.1	Conditions licensing subject deletion — 120
4.2.2	Syntactic incidence, ellipsis and verb-first clauses — 134
4.3	Dislocation, topic change and discourse topicality — 156
4.3.1	Subject dislocation — 156
4.3.2	Detachment and topicalization in English — 173
4.3.3	Topic change without dislocation — 176
4.4	What about the right periphery? — 183
4.5	Conclusion: How subjectal is informational subjecthood? — 186
5	Dissociation at the interface of informational and argumental structure — 191
5.1	Introduction — 191
5.2	Formal and cataphoric subject pronouns — 195
5.2.1	Cataphoricity — 195
5.2.2	Meteorological verbs — 199
5.2.3	Case study: Indefinite es in situational contexts — 202
5.3	Expletives — 205
5.4	Existential and locative constructions — 214
5.4.1	IT (HAS) VS. THERE (IS) — 214
5.4.2	Adv vs. Order in English — 220
5.5	THERE in Dutch and Danish — 227
5.5.1	Introduction: Dutch dær, der — 228
5.5.2	From the adverbial of place to the subject marker? Danish Der — 230
5.6	Rhematic and subjectless passives — 248
5.6.1	Predicative subjects in passive clauses? — 249
5.6.2	Subjectless passive clauses — 254
5.7	Lexical alternations in voice and argument structure with Danish verbs — 260
5.7.1	Uses of the Danish s-voice — 260
5.7.2	Verbs expressing a change of state — 262
5.7.3	Verbs expressing a change of mental state — 268
5.7.4	Siunes — 270
5.8	Conclusion: Interfaces of informational and argumental subjecthood — 275

6	Oblique subjects and argumental subjecthood — 279
6.1	Introduction: The trouble with experiencers — 279
6.2	Non-epistemic internal states — 284
6.2.1	Kinds of internal states — 284
6.2.2	Predicates of hunger in Continental Germanic — 285
6.2.3	Volition, desire, appreciation — 288
6.2.4	Regrets, pity and dreams: the struggle for argumental subjecthood — 294
6.3	Epistemic mental states — 304
6.3.1	The variety of THINK-constructions — 304
6.3.2	Oblique experiencer constructions — 308
6.3.3	Nominative experiencer — 324
6.4	Oblique experiencers with the verbum substantivum : From “free datives” to oblique subjects — 333
6.4.1	How free are “free datives”? — 334
6.4.2	Can BE take an oblique subject? — 337
6.4.3	Datives in external state predications — 340
6.5	Conclusion: From case-marking to prime actancy — 344
7	Conclusion — 353
7.1	Classifying language-specific subject configurations — 353
7.2	The scale of configurationality in Germanic — 358
7.3	Perspectives for future research — 362
8	References of the corpus — 365
9	Bibliography — 367