

Table of Contents

Preface	5
A. The Digital Transformation of the World	11
I. The Internet under the influence of the great intermediaries	11
II. Initial optimism and the present ambivalence	14
III. Can the Internet be regulated by law?	17
1. Fundamental concept of modern law.	17
2. Extending the long arm of the law to the Internet	17
3. The Snowden watershed	18
4. The confidentiality and integrity of online platforms	20
5. The ECJ's Safe-Harbor Ruling	20
6. Blockades against rationality and the challenges facing the law	23
7. The sensitive issue of state access to data	25
8. The problems of transnational regulation	27
IV. Recent tendencies and questions for the future	30
V. Recent dangers and deformations of the law	33
1. Dangers for data security through "consumer transparency"	33
2. Erosion of legal institutions and of the necessary conditions for the rule of law	40
3. Risk synergies	42
VI. Regulatory orientation provided by the value structure of fundamental rights	44
B. The Right to Informational Self-Determination in the Context of the Value Structure of Fundamental Rights	45
I. The fundamental right to informational self-determination	45
1. The idea behind it	45
2. The "Census Ruling" in which it was first formulated	46

3. No invention of a fundamental right, but rather a concrete application of the general right to privacy	47
4. Knowledge and power of disposition over personal data	48
5. Technological complexity and non-transparency as problems	49
6. Contextual conditions of the right to informational self-determination	50
7. Congruent standards for the fundamental right to informational self-determination in EU law	50
II. The general right to privacy	52
1. Informational self-determination as an element of the general right to privacy	52
2. Identity, transparency and anonymity	53
3. Limitations on anonymity	55
4. Data collection by private businesses as infringement of fundamental right	55
5. Restrictions on the freedom of information (Art. 5 Para.1 GG) and the general right to privacy (Art. 2 Para.1 in conjunction with Art. 1 Para.1 GG)	56
C. Freedom of Opinion and Freedom of the Press: Cornerstones of a Free Society	61
I. Enrichment of the diversity of opinion and sources of information through the Internet	61
II. Increased significance of the freedom of opinion and the mandate for public authorities to guarantee an adequate infrastructure	62
1. Freedom of opinion as necessary space for the expression of individuality	62
2. Freedom of opinion and freedom of the press as basis of democracy	63
3. State mandate to guarantee an adequate infrastructure	66

III. The State's duty to protect diversity and maintain the structural foundations of the fundamental right to communication	67
IV. Applicability to search engines	68
V. The press in a competitive environment: institutional protections for the press	69
1. Freedom of the press and the market	69
2. Protecting the function of the press and the state's increased responsibility to ensure fair competition	70
3. Competitive conflicts in the Internet	71
4. Waive your license fee or you will be de-listed ...	72
5. The charm of free access and the non-transparency of tough business models	74
D. Economic Liberties in the Internet	77
I. Fundamental rights relevant to doing business	77
II. Systemic connection between economic liberties and copyright laws	79
III. The demand for open content as cause of an asymmetry in competitive conditions which stands in need of correction	81
IV. Supervisory mandate for the German and European legislatures	84
E. Systemic Connection between the Right to Privacy, Enforcing the Law and Preserving the Foundations of Democracy	85
I. Development of the law in Europe	85
II. The level of German law	88
III. Challenges to the system and the necessity of responding coherently to them	91
IV. Duties to safeguard fundamental rights: the state's responsibility to regulate and influence	92
V. Elements of a digital constitution in keeping with fundamental rights	95

Abbreviations 98

Notes 100