

Contents

Acknowledgements	xi
Introduction	I
CHAPTER 1
“that my Thefts might pafs undifcovered.” Picaresque, Rogue Tales, Broadsheets and Newgate Calendars	19
CHAPTER 2
“The peasantry of Ireland have, for centuries, been at war with the laws by which they are governed.” The Early Nineteenth Century	37
CHAPTER 3
“Wherever reserve exists there is mystery, and wherever mystery – guilt.” Le Fanu and the Gothic Crime Mystery	53
CHAPTER 4
“Reader, you have seen the singular and extraordinary circumstances connected with the handkerchief, the sledge, and the sack.” Sensation and Mystery Fiction	75
CHAPTER 5
“A history of crime seemed to be written on both their faces.” L. T. Meade and End of Century Detection	95

CHAPTER 6

- "I just go by the rule of thumb, and muddle and puzzle out my cases as best I can." Detection and Mystery at the Turn of the Century 117

CHAPTER 7

- "Too sharp to be absolutely wholesome." The Golden Age I: Freeman Wills Crofts 137

CHAPTER 8

- "A deceptive air of docility." The Golden Age II: Nicholas Blake and Mrs Victor Rickard 155

CHAPTER 9

- "Among the poor the police are never regarded as the upholders of the common law, but as agents of the rich to oppress those without property." Post-Revolutionary Ireland 171

CHAPTER 10

- "A kind of private eye and general trouble-shooter." Irish Hard-Boiled and Pulp 193

CHAPTER 11

- "Not too quiet for crime." Irish Crime Fiction in the Mid-Twentieth Century I 211

CHAPTER 12

- "The law after all is just a machine that suspects everyone on general principles." Irish Crime Fiction in the Mid-Twentieth Century II 227

CHAPTER 13

“His father had been on the wrong side in the Civil War.”

Irish Spy Fiction in the 1960s and 1970s 243

CHAPTER 14

“Being Irish, you had a certain innate guile that allowed you to think like a criminal and keep one step ahead of them.”

Irish Crime Writing in the 1970s and 1980s 259

CHAPTER 15

“It was the virus of my country’s illness that felled him.”

Northern Ireland 273

CHAPTER 16

“The authority to dispose of anyone who stands in my way.”

The 1980s and Early 1990s 289

CHAPTER 17

“A surly-looking cop lounging at the security desk.”

Northern Irish Crime Fiction in the 1990s 305

CHAPTER 18

“Technically a private investigator.” Thrillers and the Diversity of Irish Crime Writing in the 1990s 321

CHAPTER 19

“People loved reading about crime in Ireland.” The Police and Private Detective Novel in the 1990s 337

CHAPTER 20

“Killers who chop up their victims, that’s all very American, or at the very least English. In Ireland it would only happen by accident, like most things.” Towards the New Millennium 359

Bibliography 377

Index 409