

Contents

Introduction — 1

Chapter II – ‘Something is wrong.’ Elements of a theory of deformation in Adorno — 11

- II.1 Adorno’s critique of identity thinking — 15
- II.2 The concept of deformation — 20

Chapter III – Where the wild things are. Adorno on the playfulness of thinking — 25

- III.1 The generative momentum and dialectical progression of concepts — 27
- III.2 Philosophy as an adventure. The childish quality of inquiry — 33
- III.3 No Man’s Land. Critical remarks on play as a generative momentum — 41
- III.4 The relation between play and skepticism in Adorno. Philosophy as ‘stammering’ — 44

Chapter IV – On ravens and writing desks. Adorno’s play with forms — 51

- IV.1 Philosophy and expression. The form-content problem in art and philosophy — 52
- IV.2 The separation of art and philosophy in Adorno. — 60
- IV.3 The Platonic play with forms: the philosopher as carver. Form follows content — 63
- IV.4 The Nietzschean play with forms: experimental expression — 70
- IV.5 The compatibility of Nietzschean and Platonic literary devices — 78
- IV.6 Fantasy and fiction in Adorno’s presentation — 80
- IV.7 Clownishness and exaggeration — 85
- IV.8 Estrangement and fallibility — 90
- IV.9 The constellation as riddle — 96

Chapter V – The child and the carcass. Spiritual experience and catastrophe — 105

- V.1 Spiritual experience in secondary sources. A critique of Adorno’s utopian contentions — 106
- V.2 Spiritual experience as an experience of philosophy. The connection to play — 113
- V.3 Metaphysical experience as originary. The dynamic of horror and play — 119
- V.4 Kant’s shadow-realm. Metaphysical experience and the Critique of Pure Reason — 122
- V.5 Metaphysical and spiritual experience: similarities and difference — 124
- V.6 The content of spiritual experience — 135
- V.7 The social and metaphysical grounding of spiritual experience — 144

VIII — Contents

Summary and Outlook — 149

Bibliography — 153

Index — 165